Long-term health effects of prenatal exposure to TCDD: parental and offspring tissue expression of cytochrome P4501A1. The levels of cytochrome P4501A1 (CYP1A1) mRNA and protein, the activity of aromatase in the maternal and foetal placenta, the levels of cholesterol and lipid peroxidation, as well as the gene expression of placental GST-alpha, were analysed at a dose of 1 microg/kg body weight (mg/kg bw) TCDD in gestating rats on gestation day (gd) 18 and gd 19. The results showed that the changes in maternal and foetal liver and uterine CYP1A1 mRNA and protein levels were correlated with increases in placental aromatase activity on gd 19, but not on gd 18. The levels of maternal and foetal liver cholesterol, total lipid and lipid peroxidation on gd 19 correlated with placental aromatase activity on gd 18. The levels of maternal and foetal liver, and maternal kidney, liver and placenta GST-alpha on gd 19 correlated with maternal and foetal liver CYP1A1 mRNA and protein, and foetal and maternal liver and kidney and foetal liver aromatase activity on gd 18, and placental aromatase activity on gd 19. These data demonstrated that prenatal exposure to 1 microg/kg bw TCDD can cause long-lasting changes in P450 activity, lipid peroxidation, cholesterol metabolism and placental GST-alpha gene expression, which may affect foetal and/or maternal health in the future. Later this month, the Department of Justice announced a major shift in how it handles cases related to gun violence. The new procedure leaves undocumented immigrants, regardless of their immigration status, to the mercy of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the same agency that has repeatedly
