The purpose of this study was to evaluate whether different support surfaces affect the postural activity of the knee joint during standing. Twenty healthy subjects, randomly divided into two groups (n=10), were required to perform a posturography protocol with different support surfaces. The joints kinematics were evaluated using a 10-camera motion capture system and K-MAC software. Posturography with a foam surface presented the least postural activity in the knee joint, and posturography with an air mat was the most active. The differences between these groups were greater than those between support surfaces. The results demonstrate that the support surface alters the postural activity of the knee joint during standing, thus influencing the neuromuscular control strategies used to maintain balance.A. L.
